unfortunate ugly one, and enlarge upon the ugliness of her features. He would expect him to exert himself to become a one. No, let her remain a "wallflower" an object of contemptuous commiseration rather than talk to her, he will go and a solitary smoke in the billiard-room.

There are yet other points upon which smart young man prides himself. He considers the art of "talk" and is fond to distinguish between the words "talk"

Beethoven.

It was the natural consequence of Beethoven's views of his art that he should —be supremely indifferent as to the comfort —of the executants of his music. Consequently —he frequently mixed with passages in his —works which he considered to be almost —"too well" for the voices or instruments —for which they are written. Such a co
—sideration would seem never to have exte
